Daniel Urges Action On Fuel Crisis

WASHINGTON – Representative Dan Daniel today called upon the Federal government to come to grips with the fuel crisis or else face "more drastic steps" later in the year.

The Virginia Congressman, in a speech in the House, criticized the loosely-coordinated government approach to the energy crisis, particularly as related to the needs of agriculture, and said the time is fast approaching when definite actions must be taken.

Daniel said 30 committees of Congress are involved in some way with energy matters and a number of Federal agencies are charged with the responsibility to oversee energy planning and requirements. Yet, he said it is necessary to "plead for assistance with a situation many have forecast and everyone knows exists."

Daniel pointed out that farmers cannot consider fuel needs as luxury and asserted that the cost of food and other related products will surely go up further if farmers are denied adequate fuel to harvest their crops.

Pleading for concerted government action, the Congressman said:

"I am firmly committed to the concept of a free market and the free enterprise system. I abhor the idea of controls, and especially government – imposed, mandatory controls. Still and all, simply talking about the problem will not make it go away. As a group, we must urgently request action by petroleum products suppliers. If this fails, we must seriously consider more drastic steps."
